

Conspiracy stories are not theories.

Conspiracies Theories are used to explain events usually attributing the outcome to a secret plot by powerful people.

Stories are narratives, some true, some false. A theory requires reasoned speculation based upon concrete evidence, a time dependency and elimination of spurious explanations.

Powerful people do have secret plans, they are called business plans and once defined business people are enthusiastic and relentless.

I speculate that successful business people rarely engage in crazy theories unless it is to focus idiots in a direction that is useful to their business objectives, Perhaps the main driver is just the unthinking driven into a survival food and vitamin buying frenzy by Alex Jones. I really do not know.

When useful idiots spread rumours about "QAnon", "9/11", or Hillary a reasoned person might speculate: why? The answer is, it does not matter. You don't have to engage.

People conspire! Yes! Don't be distracted. Focus on 2 issues;

1: Overpopulation, it is destroying the labour market and the biosphere, the market correction is going to be brutal.

2: Tax Law, Yes the game is rigged, rigged by tax laws. The hidden hand of the market picked your pocket legally using lawyers and accountants. The goal is the have no billionaires and lots of millionaires; change the rules so you have a chance to become rich through hard work.

Think deeply about creating verses aggregating wealth. Aggregation benefits the famous 0.01% and has negative social value. Wealth creation is done by organized workers with effective representation and benefits many more people. When workers can not win, they tend to storm the Bastille.
